Agnes Ingvarsdottir and her husband Ericur Petursson spent their life savings on a two-year battle over a telephone mast. They face now financial ruin after being presented with £400,000 legal costs.

Agnes Ingvarsdottir: “We face financial ruin. We have no way of ever getting anywhere near paying this, it is just unbelievable. We have no money. Even if the figure they eventually are awarded is less I doubt we could pay. The case was dragged out and it drained us of our savings.”

The family claims that they began to get ill when the mast got in operation. Agnes Ingvarsdottir: “Our lives just changed, it became very hard. We suffered headaches, nausea and vomiting, tinnitus and cardiovascular disease. I developed a blood clot in my leg, which I believe was caused by the mast. We have always been healthy people but suddenly we got everything going. I got chest infections. My guts were infected and my teeth started to fall out. It was like there was no immunity any more. The doctor said there was no guidance on treatment of illness supposedly caused by phone masts. We had to move.”
